

Where recognition divides, it favours the Tunisians

Share of each community holding each marker. The beylical order and the portrait do not separate the two (the Nichan Iftikhar at Fisher exact $p = 0.71$); holding any honour at all does not quite, at $p = 0.09$, and favours the Europeans. The French Légion d'honneur does, and in the direction a colonial hierarchy would not predict: 22% of coded Tunisians hold it against 14% of Europeans ($p = 0.029$). Read it as a statement about whom the volume printed — a Tunisian had to be more distinguished to be in it — rather than about who was decorated in Tunisia.
